Editing Versus Adjusting In the course of most image-editing tasks, the result ends up with an edited image—so you're not actually making any physical changes to the image. The end result of image editing could be as simple as reducing a white-balance setting or as complex as fixing a picture so that it looks as good as possible. Figure 2-3 shows an example of adjusting white balance and then playing with a gradient. Both of these processes leave the image with an end result. Figure 2-3. You can start by adjusting an image's white balance, but eventually you'll want to see what you've done. Once that's set, the process of creating a gradient to put on the image is even easier. However, you will occasionally find tools in which you make actual physical changes to the photo—this is referred to as editing. Generally, Photoshop is not an editing program, in which you rotate the image, crop the image, or remove a part of the image, but if you need to use these tools, you will see them throughout the rest of this book.

A new dopamine transporter (DAT) radioligand, 2-ethoxy-2-methyl-N-[2-[(18)F]fluoroethyl]-propionamide (FMEP), was synthesized and evaluated in vitro in human and rat brain tissue as well as in vivo in rat brain. Radiolabeling was achieved by nucleophilic fluorination of 2-ethyl-2-fluoro-N-methyl-3-propionamide using [(18)F]fluoride directly on a QMA cartridge and CuBr2 to provide [18F]FMEP with a total synthesis time of 45 minutes. The DAT binding specificity and regional brain distribution were determined in tissue homogenates of rat brain at 1, 5, and 60 minutes post injection (p.i.). No specific binding was observed at 60 min for [(11)C]FMEP in rat striatum and cortex and in human striatum. The binding potential (BP(ND)) in caudate, putamen, and nucleus accumbens decreased with time in the cortex (60 min: 2.4 +/- 0.3, 1.7 +/- 0.2, and 1.3 +/- 0.1, respectively) and in the striatum (60 min: 2.4 +/- 0.
